The Moth Project in partnership with the McColl Center for Visual Art and Reedy Creek Nature Center. Working with local biologists, these events allow local community members to identify and appreciate moths in their own backyards. Additionally, if bees were to disappear, could moths be used as “second shift pollinators”? The audience develops a greater understanding of local pollinators through the exploration of art and science based installations. The ArtLab provides power for evening moth friendly light sculptures and events.